

Academic Communities

About

Digital Commons Communities are arranged by school, department, institute, campus, or other Kent State University division or structure. Our Digital Commons Team works with Copyright Services to secure permission to post materials that have been previously published elsewhere. We work with Interlibrary Loan to secure electronic copies of postable documents. When we are unable to secure copyright or licensing permission to re-post previously published materials, we can add citation information and other information about the publication to the appropriate Digital Commons Community. Often we are able to provide links to full-text available through University Libraries subscriptions.

Guidelines

Materials appropriate for Digital Commons Academic Communities are generally previously published works such as journal articles or book chapters. At least one author of the work must be affiliated with Kent State University. Deposited materials are intended to be permanent contributions to the repository; once deposited, a paper or other digital object generally may not be withdrawn.

How to Contribute Content

The Digital Commons Team of Kent State University will gather appropriate content by contacting Kent State University scholars and by searching scholarly databases. Content placed in SelectedWorks pages associated with Kent State University may, at University Libraries' discretion, be added to other Digital Commons @ Kent State University Libraries Communities. If you have content that you believe is appropriate for Digital Commons @ Kent State University Libraries, please contact us at digitalcommons@kent.edu. Submitting a list of publications for consideration to the Institutional Repository does not guarantee that the contents will be added. Works submitted go through a copyright review process to ensure that Kent State University Libraries can legally post the material. Providing any relevant Copyright Transfer Agreement(s) between you and your publisher(s) will greatly accelerate this process.
